SUBJECT: SOVEREIGN BLACKOUT

ABSTRACT: THE LAMBAY PROXY (1854–PRESENT)

Upon newly discovered and released classified documents private researchers have found that the 19th-century famines did not terminate the Fluharty sovereignty as mentioned within century old, classified documents. The royal bloodline faced a battle between multiple potential heirs. Rather than engage in a tragic succession war of responsibility, one of the primary heirs willingly abdicated the throne to pursue a fated union. The remaining household relocated to Lambay Island to guard the sanctuary until their return.

Incident Report: The Tayleur Intercept (1854). Public registries attribute the January 1854 wreck of the RMS Tayleur at Lambay to faulty compass readings. █████ naval tribunal transcripts contradict this. Intelligence indicates a rival faction chartered the vessel to breach the island's perimeter. In response, local Fluharty loyalists deployed wrecker's lanterns along the Tayleur Bay cliff faces, intentionally grounding the iron hull to provide protection. The Crown of that time classified the defensive action as a tragedy to avoid political fallout.

The 1904 Baring Proxy & Lutyens Enclosure. Legal immunity required a corporate front. In 1904, the Fluharty estate facilitated a £████,████ transaction to position █████ (3rd █████) as the nominal private owner. Architect Edwin Lutyens was brought in four years later. Lutyens publicly dubbed his massive circular stone boundary a "Rampart Against Uncharity." It has been noted that unredacted structural blueprints show the council strictly dictated these dimensions for a militarized defense perimeter. Botanist Gertrude Jekyll was at the time retained. Her sycamore plantings were not a mere decoration; they actually provided necessary canopy cover to block aerial detection of the █████, █████ personnel stationed inland.

1927 Harbor Exhumation / Artifact Recovery. Harbor renovations in 1927 finds and disturbs a burial zone. On-site archaeologists logged data of a skeleton in a flexed stance, noting "a ring still on the first joint of their finger." Authorities quickly labeled it an Iron Age site and stopped digging. Newly discovered logs identify nearby remains as a prior Fluharty Sovereign. The ring that was uncovered correlates with newly uncovered documents as a Vow Band, an artifact that physically mandates the acting head to intentionally signal their unavailability to the outside world, preserving their energy and focus exclusively for a specific, destined connection. Extraction of the real band from Ireland occurred somewhere around 19██. It's whereabouts are unknown although intellectually speculated.

The Macropod Decree. The 1950s introduction of wallabies (macropods) to Lambay by the Baring proxies is often dismissed as an eccentric project. New information points out that it was a way to seal the deal, honor the crest, and as a gift to the spirit of the Fluharty heir upon their departure to find their love and maintain their independence. The macropod serves as a living crest: its biomechanics prevent it from walking backward. It symbolizes the Heir's vow to never retreat, abandoning the throne to pursue a destined union no matter the cost. Overtime the historical facts have become distorted, dusty, twisted, and unspoken as the community on the island values privacy. Honor is recognized in century old secrecy, legends, and myths. It is only now that this information comes to light and is being heavily investigated.

Present Status. Loyalist remain concealed within the Lambay woodlands, pending the bloodlines potential return as is stated in private documents ██████████ ██████████ ██████████. Recent notes gathered from a deceased messenger ██████████ ██████████ indicate the distant bloodline is in an undisclosed location somewhere within Virginia, and or the Pacific Northwest. Potential activities include active wear of the 1927 Vow Band and ongoing development of localized tactical simulations. Noted in the messenger's journal.
